A Tribute to Edward Barton

I never knew Ed Barton; rather, I was acquainted with him through his son Clayton who knew my son Jonathan, two strapping young adventurers who wanted to make a difference in the world. They came together late in their teens joining the Canadian Armed Forces and serving in Afghanistan.

Both Ed and I were of similar age, born after the Second World War, and I could see Ed's nobility in the quiet determination of his son Clay, as he encouraged my son Jon to join him in serving something larger than themselves. Both young men reflected the respect Ed and I felt for the previous heroic generations: those citizens whose names are inscribed on cenotaphs throughout small town Canada. They didn't just talk about injustice: they did something about it. I'd like to think that Ed Barton was that kind of guy. His son certainly is.
